Startup Dream Team participant 1 - Giselle Goes: "My name is Giselle Goes. I'm from Brazil. I came to the Startup Dream Team because I'm a tech writer, and I was always writing about these tech companies in Silicon Valley but I didn't know what was happening here. So, it was a great opportunity to just come here and know exactly what I'm writing about and what I'm talking about."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): “Now Giselle Goes is living under one roof with 16 men and just one other woman who are participating in the Startup Dream Team, a nine-week program for interns and aspiring entrepreneurs from different countries who want to learn more about success in Silicon Valley and grow together in a social experience.”

Giselle Goes: "I knew that there would be a bunch of guys. I'm in the biggest room, the one with eight beds. They respect my own space. They know that I'm a girl, and you know, the good thing about guys is they just don't fight about silly things."

Kym McNicholas (interviewing): "You have 18 people living in a four-bedroom house?"

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "Three-bedroom."

Kym McNicholas : “Three-bedroom house!!”

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "Yeah, it's a lot of people. It's also a great way for people to have this really strong social experience."

Kym McNicholas: “They have to really get along."

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "They have to really get along, they learn to get along, and they're willing to give up a little bit of privacy and intimacy to be in this environment."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): “It seems to be the case, as in its second year, 90 people applied for the 18 spots available for the session that ended in August."

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "The value of the program for the participants is that they will have a really strong lifetime network from all around the world."

Kym McNicholas (interviewing): “France, Brazil, Germany...”

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: “Yeah, France, Brazil, Germany, Netherlands. They also learn about entrepreneurship. We have speakers coming in, and we visited startups.

[Extract from a past Startup Dream Team talk by Will Young inserted here]: “Who here is familiar with marketing ROI numbers?"

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "When you have these intimate talks with such compelling people, you get to learn and also have a relationship with them."

Startup Dream Team participant 1 - Sander van den Broek: “Last week, I was at an event, and I was talking to this guy, he was just a regular guy and we talked for about 20 minutes and I didn't recognize him. And after a while, I found out he was one of the speakers, he was Dustin Moskowitz."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): "A rare opportunity that Sander wouldn't have gotten had he not postponed college exams to attend this program. Dustin even offered some valuable advice to take back home."

Startup Dream Team participant 1 - Sander van den Broek: "He said really strongly that you have to be really passionate about a problem and able to start solving it and building a company around it."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): "That advice is priceless, although there is a cost to the program, participants pay the rent, and sponsors cover the rest."

Kym McNicholas (interviewing): "I'm wondering what would attract sponsors because it's a brand new program. You don't have much of a track record. And I'm wondering, what is your selling point to them? Because, there are so many different programs like this across not necessarily for international entrepreneurs but there are programs like this you know throughout San Francisco throughout Silicon Valley that the sponsors, you know, could spend their dollars on. Why here? Why this program versus others?"

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "The thing that stands out is the international aspect, bringing in talented, entrepreneur-minded people who are ready to work in teams and maybe about to start companies. It's about the quality of the people they want to reach out to and the diversity. We have international participants, some developers, some business people. This is a tight group, this is a real community."

Kym McNicholas (interviewing): "Do you have a plan B?"

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "If this thing doesn't work out?"

Kym McNicholas (interviewing): "I'm just wondering. You're still looking for sponsors, but there are so few at this point. I would imagine you need a plan B."

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "Yes, because it's still a growing organization. Now, in a month, I'm going back to France. Search a little bit more. We're looking for maybe some angels who would be potential mentors in the same time, to be able to fund us to go deeper into all the programs we want to do around entrepreneurship education. Building a better brand so we have more relevance for sponsors."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): "That's critical as Pierre has big plans for the Startup Dream Team. He's talking about global expansion as early as 2014."

Pierre-Simon Ntiruhungwa: "One goal moving forward with this program is to be in Paris, London, and Berlin next year. Maybe someone can do the program here this year and next year in Paris. As people are in different stages of their life and learning path of entrepreneurship, they can start...we have people from 18 to 25 here. So at 18, they do their first program here in Silicon Valley and they can do maybe three or four by the time they think "Ok, now I can go by my own"."

Kym McNicholas (narrating): “Even Giselle would look past the line to get into the bathroom, dirty dishes in the sink, and dirty laundry on the floor if it means she can participate in the Startup Dream Team once again.”

Giselle Goes: "All the connections that I made here and all the people that I met, it's just surreal. I mean, I would never have the opportunity to really live and experience the Silicon Valley community if I was not in the program."
